

The Deconstruction of the West Through the Lens of TNA

Why Cultural Marxism and Postmodernism Inevitably Lead to Civilizational Failure of Local Closure

Abstract

Modern Western civilization is undergoing a profound crisis of meaning, legitimacy, and continuity. What once appeared stable — religion, family, tradition, property, moral order, and even biological identity — has increasingly been reinterpreted not as civilizational supports, but as systems of oppression.

From the Frankfurt School to Sartre, Foucault, Derrida, the sexual revolution, May 1968, and contemporary woke ideology, an enormous intellectual process unfolded whose common denominator was the systematic deconstruction of inherited structures of legitimacy.

Under the framework of the Theory of Axiomatic Necessity (TNA), this process can be interpreted not merely as a cultural evolution, but as a civilizational attack on N_1 itself: the external structures of closure required for large-scale social realizability.

Theoretical Introduction: The Theory of Axiomatic Necessity (TNA)

The Theory of Axiomatic Necessity (TNA) is a formal structural framework developed by Claudio Bresciano that investigates the boundary conditions, stability limits, and collapse dynamics of complex systems. Its foundational postulation states that if a system produces coherence, there exists an irreducible minimum core that sustains it; this core cannot be smaller without destroying the system, nor can it be derived from within.

To analyze any scalable architecture—whether physical, computational, or civilizational—the TNA establishes two fundamental operators:

- N_0 (The Internal Operational Domain): Represents the space of multiplicity, dynamic trajectories, desires, economics, biological drives, and local optimization. It is the plane where internal processes and individual flows take place.
- N_1 (The External Structural Support): Represents the non-operational, exogenous, and indispensable axiomatic framework that provides structural closure to the system. It does not actively execute processes within N_0 , but it defines the boundaries of admissibility that prevent multiplicity from degrading into chaos.

The Theorem of Failure of Local Closure

The core mathematical derivation of the TNA proves the Failure of Local Closure: no self-optimizing system can generate its own rules of stabilization or legitimacy from within N_0 in a self-sufficient manner. When a system expands its multiplicity ($\Delta \rightarrow \infty$) while simultaneously eroding, attacking, or rendering its external operator (N_1) illegible, it loses the capacity to collapse those expanding trajectories into a coherent reality.

The structural consequence of this asymmetry is Boundary-Induced Collapse (BIC). By removing the limiting framework that stabilizes the system, the architecture does not become infinitely free; instead, it enters a phase of hyperactive internal friction, systemic fragmentation, and eventual dissolution.

Applied to the history of ideas, the TNA demonstrates that civilizations do not collapse merely from material degradation, but rather when their intellectual frameworks systematically dismantle the axiomatic scaffolding (N_1) that made the operational reality (N_0) viable and intelligible in the first place.

1. The Frankfurt School's Cultural Turn — and the TNA Diagnosis

Critical Theory (Horkheimer, Adorno, Marcuse, Fromm, Benjamin, and later Habermas) consisted of orthodox Marxists who could not understand why the proletarian revolution failed to materialize in wealthy Western countries.

Their solution was to move the battlefield from economics to culture.

They merged Marx with Freud and launched a long march through the institutions — especially universities — with the aim of weakening the cultural foundations of the West.

TNA Rebuttal

The Frankfurt School mistook necessary N_1 structures (tradition, religion, family, and moral order) for mere instruments of class domination.

TNA shows that these structures are not arbitrary oppression, but external selection mechanisms required to stabilize high-multiplicity societies.

By attacking N_1 , they generated the conditions for pathological non-closure.

2. Reframing N_1 as Oppression — The Central Category Error

Cultural Marxism and its successors redefined the foundational stabilizers of Western civilization as pure oppression:

- Tradition → repression
- Religion/Logos → false consciousness
- Family → patriarchy
- Property → exploitation

TNA Rebuttal

These are not mere instruments of domination, but non-derivable N_1 operators.

They reduce excessive social multiplicity (Δ) and enable stable realizability.

When legitimate N_1 structures are labeled as oppression, the individual is not liberated: the very conditions for coherent social existence are destroyed.

TNA identifies this as a fundamental ontological error: confusing necessary constraints with arbitrary power.

3. Sartre and Radical Freedom — The Fantasy of Pure N_0

Jean-Paul Sartre claimed:

“existence precedes essence”

and also:

“man is condemned to be free.”

This represents the existentialist version of the same project: the total rejection of any pre-given structure or external N_1 .

TNA Rebuttal

Pure freedom without external selection mechanisms leads to unbearable anguish because the system generates:

$$\Delta > 1$$

without possessing a legitimate selector.

Sartre romanticized Failure of Local Closure.

TNA shows that human beings cannot sustainably create their own essence from nothing.

We require participation in a larger N_1 framework in order to achieve:

- meaning,
 - psychological stability,
 - and existential coherence.

4. Foucault and the Reduction of Everything to Power

Michel Foucault saw power relations everywhere.

Family,
school,
psychiatry,
sexuality,
and prison

were interpreted as disciplinary mechanisms.

TNA Rebuttal

Foucault correctly identified that power exists.

But he never distinguished between:

- legitimate N_1 (structures enabling realizability), and
- illegitimate domination.

By reducing all N_1 to power, he eliminated the very possibility of legitimate authority or transcendence.

TNA demonstrates that certain forms of closure are structurally necessary:
not every restriction is oppression.

5. Derrida and Deconstruction — The War Against Meaning

Jacques Derrida argued that:

- there is no center,
- no stable meaning,
- no fixed truth,
- only infinite deferral (différance).

TNA Rebuttal

Deconstruction represents the most radical possible attack against N_1 .

It denies the very existence of legible stabilizing structures.

TNA argues that while local dynamics (N_0) may be deconstructed, reality requires continuous but non-smooth N_1 support in order to remain realizable.

A universe of pure différance is a universe of:

- mathematical instability,
 - existential fragmentation,
 - and permanent non-closure.

6. The Structural Consequences: Pathological Non-Closure

By systematically dismantling traditional N_1 while hypertrophying N_0 (desire, identity, power, impulse), the West entered a state of extreme multiplicity without adequate selection mechanisms.

TNA Prediction (Confirmed)

The rise of:

- anxiety,
- depression,
- identity fragmentation,
- family collapse,
- demographic decline,
- polarization,
- and social atomization

are not isolated phenomena.

They are direct manifestations of Failure of Local Closure at civilizational scale.

7. Cultural Manifestations: 1968, the Sexual Revolution, and Woke Ideology

These philosophical currents did not remain academic.

They progressively transformed Western culture through:

- May 1968 protests,
- the sexual revolution,
- anti-traditionalism,
- radical individualism,
- moral relativism,
- and later identity-based ideological frameworks.

Even popular culture reflected this shift.

Films such as Easy Rider symbolized liberation from:

- family,
- nation,
- religion,

- and historical continuity.

Simone de Beauvoir's statement:

“One is not born, but rather becomes, a woman” represented another transition:

identity itself ceased to derive from inherited structures and became relocated into self-definition.

The contemporary result is a civilization increasingly organized around:

- fluid identity,
 - therapeutic legitimacy,
 - emotional validation,
 - and self-generated meaning.

8. The Collapse of Civilizational Closure

According to TNA, destroying historical N_1 structures without functional replacement inevitably generates civilizational Failure of Local Closure.

The consequences become visible everywhere:

- demographic collapse,
- loneliness,
- anxiety,
- fragmentation,
- loss of shared meaning,
- polarization,
- and chronic institutional instability.

The system attempts to compensate through pseudo- N_1 structures:

- regulatory bureaucracy,
- therapeutic states,
- identity systems,
- algorithmic moderation,

- social credit mechanisms,
- technocratic governance.

But all these substitutes remain internally derived from N_0 :

- politics,
- economics,
- desire,
- emotional consensus.

They lack true external legitimacy.

Therefore, they cannot fully stabilize multiplicity.

9. Final Reflection

The great irony is that many thinkers fleeing Nazi totalitarianism helped lay the intellectual foundations for a new form of cultural dissolution.

TNA does not propose a blind return to the past.

It reveals something deeper:

a civilization cannot survive long-term while treating its own stabilizing N_1 structures as the enemy.

The deconstruction of the West was not liberation.

It was structural self-sabotage whose consequences are becoming increasingly impossible to ignore.

The central question of our era is no longer:

“How do we deconstruct more?”

but rather:

“Can we reconstruct a legitimate, non-oppressive N_1 compatible with complexity and freedom?”

So far, the results of the experiment strongly suggest that the answer matters — existentially.

10. Conclusion: The Hyperactive N₀ Civilization

The contemporary West increasingly resembles what TNA predicts happens when N₁ becomes illegible or systematically attacked.

Society does not become freer in the deeper sense.

Instead, it becomes trapped in a hyperactive N₀:

- endless optimization,
- endless stimulation,
- endless identity reconstruction,
- endless deconstruction,
- but diminishing coherence.

The deconstruction of Western civilization did not eliminate the need for:

- transcendence,
- closure,
- legitimacy,
- or meaning.

It merely removed the historical structures that once performed those functions.

The result is a civilization with:

- enormous multiplicity (Δ extremely large), but
- rapidly declining ability to stabilize itself.

Under TNA, this is no longer merely a political crisis.

It is a structural crisis of civilizational non-closure.
